

Week 15 Answers GR

Helping Hand

1. When you talk about something and the same thing happens sometime later in a completely unrelated way.
2. No because it states: If you were my friend. The use of the subjunctive if you were implies that they are not friends at the moment.
3. "I did realize that you have to do some things differently, but it's not like you don't do almost everything the rest of us do," shows the narrator has started to understand what life is like for the student. They also understand why the student didn't want to go on the swing, because it's hard to balance.
4. They tell the student they are great in the jungle gym and fast at running – faster than Ali.
5. Confess
6. The student would be feeling more accepted because they are now joining in playing with the children. "You're great in the jungle gym, even if you don't hang from the bars, and you can run really fast, even faster than Ali." The narrator also apologises to the student which shows that the friendship is developing.
7. The narrator is making an effort to try and include the student by telling them things which happened in the past. They are also trying to teach the student that these films are called documentaries. Chat is a way of including the student, which shows their friendship is growing deeper.
